Scenario

Maya feels anxious before weekly presentations. Her automatic thought is: Everyone will notice every mistake and conclude that I am incompetent. She rates the belief at 80 percent and her anxiety at 7 out of 10.

Coaching response

The coach asks Maya to separate observable facts from predictions. Evidence supporting the thought is that she paused twice in her last presentation. Evidence against it is that colleagues asked useful follow-up questions, her manager approved the proposal, and no one criticized her competence.

A balanced alternative thought is: I may pause or make a small mistake, but I can still explain the main idea clearly. A pause does not prove incompetence. Maya then rates her belief in the original thought at 45 percent and her anxiety at 4 out of 10.

Behavioral Experiment

Plan

Before the next presentation, Maya will practice the opening for five minutes, deliberately allow one short pause, and record whether listeners remain engaged. She predicts that at least half the audience will react negatively. The observable measure is the number of negative comments or visible signs of disengagement.

Result

After the presentation, Maya records zero negative comments. Three colleagues ask relevant questions, and the manager requests a follow-up plan. Her anxiety falls to 3 out of 10. The experiment does not prove that every future presentation will be easy, but it weakens the catastrophic prediction.

Key retrieval facts

Question	Expected answer
What is the unique test code?	ORBIT-LANTERN-4827
What was Maya's initial anxiety?	7 out of 10
What balanced thought did she use?	A pause does not prove incompetence.
How many negative comments occurred?	Zero
What was her final anxiety?	3 out of 10

Suggested retrieval query: What evidence weakened Maya's catastrophic prediction?
